Expanded advice services good news for super fund members

Members of Queensland super fund, LGIAsuper, are receiving better super advice than ever before with the fund recently expanding its telephone service, at no added cost to members.

Leading financial education and advice company, Link Advice (part of the ASX-listed Link Group) came on board this financial year to support LGIAsuper's in-house telephone financial advice service.

LGIAsuper CEO Kate Farrar said Link Advice was qualified to assist members with a broader range of topics than was possible before, including contributions, investment choice, insurance, transition to retirement, simple retirement advice, and a retirement health check.

"The partnership with Link Advice gives LGIAsuper access to a pool of qualified advisers and enables us to scale up our advice service as demand increases," Ms Farrar said.

Ms Farrar said members could also access advice outside of Brisbane's normal business hours.

"Our members will benefit from this increased availability, and we are particularly pleased for our members in regional areas who rely heavily on telephone advice," Ms Farrar said.

"Improving our members' financial wellbeing is what drives us, and it is what has made this partnership so appealing. It is great to be able to offer this extended service at no additional cost to our members since it is available as part of your membership."

Link Advice CEO, Duncan McPherson said Link Advice was excited to partner with LGIAsuper.

"LGIAsuper is an organisation that shares our commitment to providing members with the opportunity to access financial advice and improve their life in retirement," Mr McPherson said.

"Speaking to a financial adviser about your superannuation is a valuable step in taking more control of your retirement savings and, at Link Advice, we believe strongly in making this advice accessible and affordable for all Australians."

Advice appointments are available to members via telephone during the extended hours of 7.00am to 5.00pm, Monday to Friday. to discuss what steps you can take to grow your super.
